It's no secret that the future of House is changing exceedingly. Recently, an entirely new type of sound has started to emerge in the house scene, called "Future House". The term originally came about when Madeon released his hit single "Technicolor" in 2014, which featured eerie vocal samples and warped beats. A year later in 2015, Astrix (a pseudonym for Max Siever) dropped his groundbreaking acapella "Tomorrow" with its non-traditional vocals and abstract sound design. When these two tracks gained significant traction in underground clubs around the world they became known as "Future House". As the years progressed, so did the sound. Once reserved for underground dance floors, Future House is now being played at festivals around the world. What started out as a softer more progressive form of House has become an all out sonic assault of distorted synths, distorted vocals, heavy kicks and 808's. With artists like Madeon gaining mainstream recognition for this new sound people are truly beginning to understand how big it has become.
